

SECOND INTERNATIONAL SYMPOSIUM ON GENDER IDENTITY

This Symposium aims to focus attention on the problem of gender identity disorientation, not only as a psychiatric entity but as an area requiring specialised medical study and treatment as well as social understanding

Much has still to be learned about the transsexual phenomenon — fixed conviction of an individual that his or her psychological sex does not conform to his anatomical sex — roughly estimated to occur in one in every 100,000 children. Transsexuals (who are usually neither homosexual nor transvestite) are often socially maladjusted and, if denied positive help, may commit suicide

No one knows just how many sex reassignment operations have been performed since many take place very quietly, but estimates range into the thousands. There are now 15 gender identity clinics functioning to some degree in the United States and generally performing surgery. Preliminary treatment with hormones is now most often being administered by general practitioners or endocrinologists throughout the country. Approximately one thousand persons are presently receiving this hormone treatment

In addition to the medical and research aspects of the problem, there is urgent need for greater academic and professional understanding and for education of the public at large. Recent legal decisions, reports in the scientific press, and current books and articles on the subject, as well as activity in the psychotherapeutic and social work fields, are all helpful; but these mark merely the beginning of what must be a wholehearted effort to initiate, encourage and coordinate an intensive program of study and help

The international co-operation of scientists, researchers, teachers and social workers, as well as the active assistance of socially concerned citizens and the use of every medium of communication, are needed to make the public aware of the scope of this problem, and of the need to reduce the social waste and human misery associated with it
